MI is based on the tenet that within every client/consumer resides a co-therapist who has the skills to successfully change behavior. How do we work with and not against the co-therapist? The emphasis of this training will be to build on existing skills and develop further skills in the application of Motivational Interviewing (MI) within the therapeutic setting.

MI is often a conversation about ambivalence or the internal argument of the side that wants to be rid of the problem (pro change), and a side that doesn't believe change is possible or beneficial (stay the same). When we argue for one side, the client will strengthen the side that does not want to change. We – the clinicians – have the capacity to drive client resistance up and down within the same session, simply by switching between a directive-confrontive and listening-supportive style. This training is designed for professionals who say, "I want more..."
